

“After 10 years,
chronic complaints
still determine my life.”

What can toxic substances do to a person? Almost unnoticed, they can make you sick and paralyze your nervous system. They turn your life completely upside down, without you knowing what caused it. The Neuro-Toxicity Research Foundation was established to investigate the link between toxic substances and these symptoms. The collective name is Aerotoxic Syndrome: a condition caused by toxic air.

“My name is Evelyn van den Heuvel. I was in perfect health when I started as a flight attendant at KLM. After three years of flying, little was left. I started having symptoms of failure in my legs and arms and dropped everything from my hands. In the evening I could no longer climb the stairs. I had tunnel vision, blurred vision and terrible headaches. But I also felt cognitively impaired: a poor memory and had to make a lot of effort to follow things. In short, a war of attrition. Now, after not flying for about 10 years, these chronic complaints still determine my life every day.” ■

“I am Michel Mulder, trained as a doctor and pilot. I had to give up my job as a commercial pilot at KLM after serious health problems and decided to devote my life to the treatment of affected air crew. In my practice as a doctor, I have seen many patients with an aviation background. They all have damage consistent with long-term exposure to toxic substances from turbines, the Aerotoxic Syndrome. The airlines have never taken these types of complaints seriously. These risks certainly also apply to passengers, ground staff and residents directly surrounding airports, thousands of people in total.” ■

Ronald van der Kuil, specialized in functional neurology, is the founder of the foundation. He has started a large-scale scientific study that he believes is crucial for a better diagnosis and medical approach to prevent premature health damage. Specialists and professors at home and abroad are involved, but the research takes years and is very expensive. That is why money is needed. With a gift you contribute to the health of future generations. ■
